

Ariana Cisneros

12th grade

Las Cruces High School

New Mexico

Becoming a physical therapist isn't just a career goal; it is rooted deep within me. My journey towards this aspiration is a patchwork of personal experiences, lessons, and an unyielding desire to make a tangible, positive impact on others' lives.

Growing up my family encountered health battles that changed my perspective profoundly. Both my dad and grandpa faced formidable foes—cancer. My grandpa valiantly fighting bladder cancer, eventually succumbed to its grasp. Amidst this hardship, I found solace in being there for him, providing care and support during his most trying times.

My dad, battling leukemia, embarked on a challenging path to remission. Witnessing his resilience and the transformative power of healthcare ignited a passion within me. It was a catalyst propelling me towards a career path where I could channel my empathy and determination into tangible assistance for others facing similar challenges.

My pursuit led me to kinesiology – a discipline that promised a deeper understanding of anatomy, biomechanics, and movement optimization. Through this field, I am discovering a profound way to help people regain strength, mobility and function. Physical therapy emerged as the nexus where my passion for helping others converged with my fascination for human movement and wellness.

The experiences weren't merely observational; they were personal. I underwent physical therapy due to my own injuries, experiencing firsthand the transformative power of rehabilitation. It wasn't just about recovering physically; it was about reclaiming a quality of life. This personal encounter amplified my desire to offer the same hope and healing to others.

Beyond the personal sphere my vision extends to broader societal impact. I envision a world where education and healthcare are accessible to everyone, irrespective of their financial circumstances. Should I be fortunate enough to receive this scholarship, I'm committed to paying it forward by supporting underprivileged students on their educational journeys. Establishing mentorship programs and providing resources to aid their academic success is a commitment close to my heart.

Moreover, I aim to bridge gaps in healthcare accessibility. Creating low cost or free physical therapy clinics and deploying mobile therapy units to underserved areas are pivotal steps towards ensuring equitable healthcare access. I envision educating communities about preventive measures, offering rehabilitation services, and initiating workshops on ergonomic practices to promote long term physical health.

My passion for physical therapy isn't solely born from personal experiences; it's a fusion of empathy academic pursuit and a desire to enhance individuals' lives. It's a commitment to alleviating pain, restoring mobility, and empowering people to embrace life to its fullest.

Every facet of my journey- the struggles the victories the empathy and the academic pursuit has converged to fuel my unwavering dedication to this path. It's more than a career; it's a vocation to make a difference one life at a time.