What Drives Me

Ever since I was a little kid, the world of medicine has always held a special place in my heart. Recently, I've had a realization that being an OBGYN (Obstetrician-gynecologist), helping women through some of the most significant moments in their lives, is where I belong.

I plan on getting a medical degree, bachelor's degree, a minor in both Chinese and Psychology in college. I will also be completing residency. The phrase "You don't reap what you don't sow." is important for a huge challenge like this, so I have already started working toward my dream of becoming an OBGYN.

The spark for becoming an OBGYN was ignited when I found a video of my own birth, a moment frozen in time. It struck me like a lightning bolt - OBGYNs aren't just doctors; they are heroes. They guide women through pregnancies, ensure safe childbirth, and provide vital care for women's health. They are the unsung champions of our society.

What sets me apart is my deep sense of empathy and compassion. To me, being an OBGYN isn't just about medical knowledge; it's about forming profound connections with people. I want to create a sanctuary where women feel safe discussing their most personal health concerns, whether it's pregnancy, reproductive health, or gynecological issues. I yearn to be there for them during their most vulnerable moments.

As I dive deeper into this path, I'm increasingly aware of the formidable challenges women face in healthcare. This awareness fuels my commitment to becoming an OBGYN. I want to be a strong advocate for women's health, tirelessly working to ensure that every woman, regardless of her background, receives the highest quality of care. Whether it's addressing maternal mortality rates or promoting easy access to reproductive healthcare, I believe OBGYNs can be the change-makers we need.

The most soul-stirring aspect of obstetrics-gynecology is the privilege of witnessing the miracle of childbirth. It's a breathtaking experience, a moment when life blooms anew. I can't think of a greater honor than being part of this breathtaking journey for countless families.

Medicine never stands still, and I'm exhilarated by the prospect of lifelong learning, embracing the latest technologies, treatments, and techniques that can elevate patient outcomes and enhance the quality of care in obstetrics-gynecology.

In essence, my journey to becoming an Obstetrician-Gynecologist is fueled by an deep passion for women's health, an bold sense of empathy, and an intense desire to make a meaningful difference in my future patients' lives. I strive to be a steadfast supporter for women during their most pivotal moments, a witness to the beauty of life's beginnings. I hope to become a beacon of hope in the medical field for all women. I am overly excited to embark on this heartwarming journey that is both a privilege and a responsibility. If I've learned one thing it's that if you have a dream chase it, because a dream won't chase you back.
