"16.8% of Native Americans receive a Bachelor's degree or higher in the United States. As a young Native American girl in this country I refuse to fall into these statistics. I have made it not only my goal but my mission to overcome and off balance these statistics even if it's one person at a time. My education continues to grow as I enter college to further study biology and become a labor and delivery nurse."

Violet Gowdy

West Linn High School

"In college I am studying food science with a minor in entrepreneurial business so I can understand the scientific processes that occur within baking and get more information on the technical side of running a business. From there, I'm planning on going to pastry school so I can apply what I learned in college. When I'm done with school my plan is to save up and open a "Baking with Violet" storefront."

Maggie Benetti

R.A. Long High School

"Most people think agriculture is just about producing crops, and raising livestock. There is scientific evidence that points to pesticides and chemicals that are used in our food being linked to a cause of chronic disease. I want to go into this career to hopefully help make a change in the way we are farming, treating livestock, and what we are putting on our food. This drives me to want a higher education to be able to bring this change."
